

UkraineAlert October 27, 2021

Europe must defend itself against Vladimir Putin's energy weapon

By Diane Francis

Russia's role in Europe's current gas crisis should be a wake-up call for Europeans who prefer to downplay the threat posed by Vladimir Putin's revisionist regime. As the reality of Russian energy blackmail becomes more difficult to deny, calls are now mounting for the European Union to reduce its reliance on Russia and reassess its relationship with Moscow.

In an address to the European Parliament in Strasbourg on October 20, European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen warned that the European Union was "vulnerable" as it currently imports 90 percent of its gas, much of it from Russia. "Europe today is too reliant on gas and too dependent on gas imports," the Commission President stated in a thinly veiled reference to Russia.

Meanwhile, in a widely quoted interview published on the same day, German Green Party co-chair Annalena Baerbock accused Moscow of playing a "poker game" with European gas supplies and called on Germany to resist Kremlin pressure to certify Russia's controversial Nord Stream 2 pipeline. "We can't allow ourselves to be blackmailed" by Russia, commented Baerbock, whose Green Party is currently engaged in three-way coalition talks to form the next German government.

Similar sentiments are also being voiced in Moldova, where a recently elected pro-EU government finds itself facing the prospect of a Russian gas cut-off amid pressure from Moscow to downscale ties with the European Union. Speaking to the BBC on October 26, former Moldovan presidential advisor Sergiu Tofilat claimed the Kremlin is "punishing" Moldovans for voting against the country's pro-Russian party. "Vladimir Putin is trying to keep former Soviet countries within the area of influence of the Kremlin. We do not want to stay on our knees in front of Moscow. We must say no to Russian blackmail," he stated.

These frank commentaries reflect mounting alarm over the Kremlin's use of energy as a geopolitical weapon, something that critics of Nord Stream 2 have warned about for several years. These statements also indicate that European policymakers are belatedly coming to terms with the reality of a hostile Russia.

During the first two decades following the end of the Cold War, interaction between Russia and the West was often tense. The relationship took a dramatic turn for the worse in 2014 when Putin seized Crimea and invaded eastern Ukraine, ushering in a new era of escalating Russian aggression towards the wider democratic world. Moscow's tactics have Putin is now on the cusp of a major strategic coup as he seeks to gain regulatory approval and begin shipping natural gas directly to Germany via his new gas pipeline, Nord Stream 2. This will give Moscow unprecedented leverage over the continent’s energy markets. And the Russian leader is already demonstrating what that will mean.

Construction of Nord Stream 2 is complete but the pipeline has not yet received official approval to start operating due to court challenges in Germany on anti-trust, national security, and environmental grounds. The US Congress and most EU leaders believe Nord Stream 2 is a geopolitical weapon disguised as an economic project, but a combination of powerful German business interests and Russian influence has so far enabled the pipeline to overcome opposition.

Russia’s ownership of the Nord Stream 2 project through a Gazprom subsidiary contravenes EU regulations and may impede certification. Rather than wait for the approval process to deliver its verdict, Putin has taken matters into his own hands. Since summer 2021, Russia has refused to meet rising demand for gas across Europe. This has created a severe supply shortage that has driven prices up to record highs and produced an unprecedented shortfall in storage volumes ahead of the winter heating season.

Despite calls for Russia to step in and ease Europe’s gas crisis, Putin and other senior Kremlin officials have refused offers to increase gas deliveries via the Ukrainian transit network. Instead, they have openly stated that the crisis can only be eased by the rapid certification of Nord Stream 2. Critics fear that if such strong-arm tactics work and the pipeline is swiftly approved while bypassing German and EU regulations, Putin will succeed in tightening his control over Europe’s gas supplies and undermining the rules-based principles of the continent’s energy markets.

Online Event | Fri, October 1, 2021 • 9:00 am ET

Which way will Ukrainian judicial reform go?

On his recent visit to Washington, President Volodymyr Zelenskyy claimed that judicial reform is one of his biggest achievements, but since he returned to Kyiv, the process to begin the reforms has been greatly complicated. What is the way out of this impasse?

REGISTER

Civil Society

Corruption

Political Reform

Rule of Law

Crucially, certification of Nord Stream 2 will also allow Russia to bypass Ukraine’s gas transit system altogether. Opponents of Nord Stream 2 have long argued that the principle objective of the economically unjustified pipeline is to remove Russia’s dependence on Ukraine’s gas transit network in order to give the Kremlin a freer hand in its hybrid war against Ukraine. While Putin’s latest gas games should alert all EU leaders to the dangers posed by Russia, they also should remind them that Ukraine remains in grave danger.

The conflict between Russia and Ukraine first erupted in 2014 following the overthrow of pro-Kremlin Ukrainian President Viktor Yanukovych. For the past seven years, Russia has occupied Crimea and much of eastern Ukraine’s Donbas region, where Ukrainian and Kremlin forces continue to face off in a bloody stalemate along a 400km front line.

Russia remains far from reconciled to the loss of Ukraine, as demonstrated by highly belligerent recent articles authored by Putin himself and former Russian president Dmitry Medvedev. There is little question that Moscow intends to force Ukraine back into the Kremlin orbit.

The looming threat posed by Russia should provide new impetus to Ukraine’s faltering domestic reform agenda. Since 2014, the Ukrainian authorities have been preoccupied with rebuilding the country’s threadbare armed forces and have struggled to uproot corruption in the judiciary, media sector, political class, and state institutions.

Efforts to achieve reform breakthroughs have been consistently blocked by a powerful alliance of oligarchic and Russian influences. Both have a vested interest in keeping Ukraine as corrupt and dysfunctional as possible. However, with Russia now poised to isolate Ukraine from Europe in the energy sector, anti-corruption efforts have become a national security priority. Without reforms, Ukraine will be unable to join the EU or NATO.

Thanks to Putin’s increasingly undisguised attempts at energy blackmail, more and more Europeans are now coming to regard Russia as a hostile neighbor. They must now act decisively to defend their countries and their values.

In the short term, this means strictly enforcing the EU’s own energy regulations with regard to Putin’s pipeline, while imposing sanctions together with the US in response to the weaponization of gas supplies. Looking ahead, Europe must consider rethinking its entire relationship with Moscow in order to limit its exposure to unfriendly Russian actions.

The future of Europe is at stake. Russia intends to create a continent where might is right and the rules no longer apply to the powerful. This is simply unacceptable and poses a direct challenge to the core principles of the European Union.

Diane Francis is a Nonresident Senior Fellow at the Atlantic Council’s Eurasia Center, editor-at-large with the National Post in Canada, author of ten books, and author of a newsletter on America.

Further reading

UkraineAlert | Oct 26, 2021

Ukraine seeks role in German certification of Putin’s pipeline

By Myron Wasylyk

Ukraine’s Naftogaz has applied to the German authorities to participate in the certification process of Vladimir Putin’s Nord Stream 2 pipeline, which is viewed in Kyiv as a geopolitical weapon aimed at Ukrainian statehood.

Energy Markets & Governance

European Union

UkraineAlert | Oct 12, 2021

Medvedev echoes Putin’s dangerous Ukraine obsession

By Peter Dickinson

Former Russian president and prime minister Dmitry Medvedev has penned a vitriolic essay attacking the current Ukrainian leadership that underlines the scale of Moscow’s dangerous obsession with the loss of Ukraine.

Conflict

Disinformation

UkraineAlert | Sep 14, 2021

Belarus dictator poses growing threat to Ukraine

By Lisa Yasko

Belarusian dictator Alyaksandr Lukashenka's growing dependence on the Kremlin is allowing Vladimir Putin to expand his military presence in Belarus and creating a new front in Russia's hybrid war against Ukraine.

The views expressed in UkraineAlert are solely those of the authors and do not necessarily reflect the views of the Atlantic Council, its staff, or its supporters.

Read more from UkraineAlert

UkraineAlert is a comprehensive online publication that provides regular news and analysis on developments in Ukraine's politics, economy, civil society, and culture.

The Eurasia Center's mission is to enhance transatlantic cooperation in promoting stability, democratic values and prosperity in Eurasia, from Eastern Europe and Turkey in the West to the Caucasus, Russia and Central Asia in the East.

EXPLORE THE PROGRAM

Follow us on social media and support our work

SUPPORT OUR WORK

Image: Russian President Vladimir Putin speaks at the 18th Annual Meeting of the Valdai Discussion Club. (Dmitry Feoktistov/TASS via REUTERS)

